When a group of school children visited a bat cave in the mountains yesterday, one of the girls went missing. Fearing she might be hurt, a teacher and one of the group leaders went back into the cave to look for her. After half an hour in the pitch darkness, the girl was found quite unharmed. She said she hadn't meant to cause trouble, but she had been so busy looking for bats that she hadn't noticed that the rest of her class had moved on. The group leaders commended her on her decision to stay put and wait for help rather than try to find her own way in the dark which would have put her in graver danger.
